not the scientific aspects of proofs. Now such an approach is eminently valuable to lay apostles, for their faith and love is to be tested daily in the stresses and strains of their vocation. The pious devotional life of the past centuries is simply not tough-sinewed enough equipment to withstand or to conquer the powerful forces of the modern world. And, as Father Gleason points out, they enter the lists not as defenders but as conquerors. Christianity, since the permanent victory of Christ on the Cross, is a conquering force. It is a slow but eternally sure battle we fight. The author's chapters entitled "Hope and Fear" and "The Work of the Christian" are especially meaty. He makes fine use of the latest German, French and American theologians. Here and there an unsupported or unexplained sentence mars the enjoyment of this book.

Father Geaney writes in a much brisker style because his book is not quite so theological. He has a very fresh and challenging way of saying quiet, profound things. He makes what is perennial in the Church appear as immediate as today's newspaper. "Whoever is to carry the message of Christ to man," he writes, "must gladly bear the stamp of his times. He must identify himself with its culture, wear its garb, make the aspirations of its people his own." "Young people cannot understand why we cling to the outmoded forms of a world that has already spent itself. Their viewpoint is refreshingly logical and basically Christian . . . because it parallels on a natural level the God-orientated virtue of hope."

In such a spirit he surveys the American Church, its problems and its promises, the parish, the family, youth and the occupational world. This is a stimulating and provocative book which should be read preferably after Father Gleason's. Action should follow contemplation, but not in such a way that first we pray and then we act. Rather it should be like the incense permeating the liturgical activities of the Mass. This modern world needs most a contemplative laity in action.
